The Mysterious Disappearance of Stanley Brown

Stanley Brown was a happy man. He lived all alone in a forest at the foot of a mountain in a small, wooden shack he had built with his own hands. He spent his days collecting sticks for the fire, scavenging berries and fungi for sustenance and watching the cool waters of the brook that rushed unceasingly through the forest. He was 127 years old.

At the break of the fifteenth day of his 25th year in the forest, Stanley was woken by an impertinent-sounding knock on the shack's rickety wooden door.

Stanley opened one eye: a horrible, grinning face was leering through the open window. Alarmed, Stanley leapt up and ran to the window.

"Who-?" he began, but was immediately interrupted by the face.

"Good morning, Mr Brown. WHAT a fine day. I was starting to believe that spring would never arrive this year. Rain, rain, rain - and the temperature's been decidedly chilly, hasn't it? I've given up on my tomato plants, I'm sure it's going to be a terrible year for crops. May I ask a favour, Mr Brown? May I ask you to open the front door? It's SO lovely to meet you!"

20

Stanley shut the window, feeling like he had been caught in a downpour and was now sodden with the creature's words. Shuddering, he quickly determined to do whatever the face asked, the quicker to be rid of it. In the weeks and months to come, Stanley Brown would remember this snap decision and look back on it as the moment his subsequent troubles became inescapable.

Stanley opened the door slowly, in contrast to the great haste with which his visitor charged into his home and filled it up with its face and body.

It sniffed the air. "Is there any tea on the go? Never mind, I mustn't stop. I'm in a fearful rush. SO nice to meet you, though."

Stanley took a good look at the horrifyingly verbose female who had imposed herself on his previously tranquil shack. She was as wide as she was tall and her rotund frame was draped in silks, pashminas and animal hides of indeterminate origin, none of which matched. Her leering, pasty face was adorned in smudgy scarlet and vivid blue daubings.

Before he could tell her to get out or shut up or at least inform him as to the reason for this invasion, the creature began scuffling on the floor, casting aside piles of firewood and old, patched rugs.

"Ah, here it is," she beamed, pointing to a small, rectangular shape etched on the wooden floor and, taking up her gaudily beringed hand, she rapped sharply on it thrice.

All at once, the floor opened up to reveal a deep, spiral staircase, lit by a thousand glowing fireflies.
